

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

Delos Internet Unfazed by Hurricane Ike

Houston, Texas – September 18, 2008 - After Hurricane Ike came ashore during the early morning hours on Saturday, September 13th, most of the Houston-Galveston metro area was left in the dark without power and with extensive Internet outages.

Delos Internet, with customers mainly located within Houston, remained fully operational during and after the storm. According to the Associated Press, the power blackouts that were left in the wake of Hurricane Ike spurred the largest Internet outage in United States history since the 2003 Northeast blackouts. As of Monday, September 15th, over 400 networks had been affected by Ike.

Delos Internet has maintained connectivity with all its customers via battery and generator power from the company's POPs (Points of Presence) throughout the Houston metro area. Additionally, because Delos Internet utilizes high frequency radios to transmit to its customers; they have been able to bypass the difficulties encountered by traditional wired/copper Internet providers.

"We are very excited to see that our strict engineering standards paid off," said Ben Crawford, the company's President. "All of our customers that had power were able to stay connected throughout the storm."

The company lifted new registration restrictions for its downtown condominium customers, allowing friends and family to use their laptops and computers for Internet access at no cost. "We understand that many people are displaced and are staying with family and friends downtown where there is power. All Internet access in those condominium buildings will be free until further notice."

Delos Internet is a provider of high speed Internet and private point-to-point data circuits to businesses throughout the Houston area. The company owns and operates a state-of-the-art fixed microwave network. The company's high performance gigabit network provides a reliable alternative to traditional copper providers with much higher speeds.

###

Contact:
Public Relations
publicrelations@delosinternet.com
713-223-1200